OUR STORY

Food Dignity[®] Founder, Clancy Harrison, has been on the ground fighting hunger as a volunteer, food pantry president, and advocate for over twenty seven years. During her time, she noticed a consistent problem.

Her local food bank purchased over 40,000 pounds of end-of-life produce each week. By the time the produce arrived at the food pantry, it was often rotten, slimy, or moldy. If the food was safe for human consumption, which sadly was not always the case, food pantry clients were forced to consume it within a day before it was rotten.

Clancy asked, "Why are we getting moldy corn from Mexico when our local farmers grow it?" This led to a bigger question — "Why are millions of federal and state agricultural dollars running through the charitable food system and not going directly to local and regional food systems?"

OUR VISION

At Food Dignity[®], we believe in the importance of connecting small farmers directly to people who need their food the most. We know that if produce sits in warehouses, it is not on someone's plate and it will spoil. We also know that if we do not support our local farmers, we will lose their critical link to our land and our local economy.
